Greetings Everyone!!

Ideas on How to Handle Parents

Studies show parental involvement is critical to a child's academic success. Parents should always feel welcome to contact you with questions and concerns. But if a parent's phone calls, e-mails and conference requests become overwhelming, and you find you're spending too much of your time on one student, it's time to address the situation. If the parent's concerns are unwarranted, reassure them that their child is well-adjusted socially, behaving properly, and progressing academically. Provide specific details to back up your assertion. Assure the parent you will contact them if a problem does arise. If the parent's concerns are justified, work with them to proactively develop an action plan that will help the student overcome the issue they're facing. Involve the parent in the plan. Suggest actions they can take at home to support what you're doing in the classroom. Then take steps to manage the future level of contact. Suggest a communication schedule that you think is reasonable and that the parent is comfortable with. For instance, commit to checking in with the parent every two or three weeks to apprise them of their child's progress. Tell them that if a problem arises sooner, you'll contact them. These are just some ideas that may help.
